Katie has made an important decision...

My mother's voice rang in my ears. 'Honey, I just don't think this little trip is a good idea. You hate to be alone. Why do you want to go halfway around the world to some godforsaken country all by yourself?'

5 I'd tried to explain that it was just that – the fact that I'd never done anything remotely spontaneous before, that I hadn't so much as had lunch by myself in the six years since graduating from college, but she hadn't understood. Neither had anyone else.

'You're going where?' My father had asked when I announced my plan during one of my mandatory, bimonthly visits to their house in Westchester, finally looking up from the Wall Street Journal for what must have been the first time in my adult life.

10 'Vietnam. For a backpacking trip. There will be a group of eight, people from all over the world, and we'll have a leader who will take us through the country. I think it'll be amazing,' I said, not a little defensively, trying to convince myself as much as him.

15 'Humph,' he exhaled, and buried his face back between the pages. 'I spent some of the best years of my life trying to avoid that hellhole and now my kid is paying to go. Pretty damn ironic if you ask me.' End of discussion.

Their doubts made it all the more appealing, of course. You don't have to be some angsty<sup>1</sup> teenager to find enormous satisfaction in pissing off your parents, that much was sure.

20 But I did have to admit, this was not what I had pictured when I'd carefully packed my cutest sundresses and shopped for weeks for hiking boots with the perfect combination of ruggedness and femininity.

British sisters describe how they swam for eight hours to reach safety after their Indonesian ferry sank

Two sisters who were on board a ferry that sank off a remote Indonesian island have revealed how they spent ten hours clinging to the wreckage<sup>1</sup> before swimming for eight hours through shark infested waters to reach safety.

5 Backpackers Katherine and Alice Ostojic from Stevenage had been on their way to the island of Komodo on a four day cruise when their vessel struck a coral reef in the middle of the night and sank.

Katherine, 21, who is studying aerospace engineering at Bristol University, and her younger sister Alice, who is on her gap year, were thrown into the water with 21 other passengers and crew.

10 But with no working radio on board to call for help the two girls were forced to stay with the wreckage and hope any passing boats would spot them and come to their rescue.

Eventually after ten hours sat on the semi submerged roof of the boat in blistering sunshine with nothing to drink, the pair decided their best chance of survival would be to swim for the nearest island, which was five miles away.

15 In an astonishing feat of stamina and determination, Katherine and Alice swam for eight hours through treacherous waters to reach an uninhabited volcanic island.

Once there they managed to alert some local fishermen who came to their aid and were able to deliver them to safety on the nearby island of Sumbawa.

20 But despite their harrowing ordeal<sup>2</sup>, the girls insisted on playing down the experience, simply telling their mother they were fine "having swum to the shore".

Joan Ostojic, 55, said she was very proud of the way her daughters had coped with their experience and said it was typical of them to play it cool.

She explained how Katherine had travelled to South East Asia to join her younger sister who was on the last few months of her gap year.
